Rough description: A hard, 21-26km walk involving 1,000-1,200m of ascent taking 7-10 hours depending on the exact target. The shorter version to the Tikitiki Stream and back is all on track whilst trying to get to the Tikitiki Waterfall involves a big effort navigating off-track which is very slow going.

The track is pretty good most of the time and work in 2015 improved some of the trickier stream crossings, though there are still one or two slightly trying bits. The track itself can be walked even in inclement weather as the superb forest offers good shelter and the surface is clean and relatively dry – there is very little or no mud! However attempting to get to the waterfall in wet conditions is not advised as there are numerous stream crossings

This is a superb forest area and there are some large trees still standing plus some of the artifacts from logging days can be seen.

Detail: Park in the small car park (01^{841masl}) ten minutes down the gravel section of Clements Mill Road. There is a gated entry to the track which is well groomed for the first several hundred metres. The forest is very dense and lush in this area hence it offers pretty good shelter on days with bad weather. Soon after starting to walk a high (2-3 metres) tree stump will be seen on the right; this is a remnant from pre-chainsaw logging days. Inspection will show wedges cut into the upper part of the stump and these were used to support the platform where the loggers stood to use their axes and huge hand saws. There are also some small streams to cross and these do not present much of a hazard apart from slippery rocks in the bottom.

There are not too many features to note on this track apart from a new, unsigned (02^{1016masl}) track joining after 2k or 45minutes. The clearing or site of the old Te Iringa Hut (03^{1101masl}) is reached in about 90 minutes, the hut was burned down some years ago (1994). This is a good morning tea stop.

There is a very pleasant meadow area allowing camping and a sign-board exists in case of confusion after a good night's sleep. Presently there are only two clear exits from this site but pre Cyclone Bola there was a link track to Punchy's Road. Continuing on from the clearing the path is not quite as wide or smooth and it does ascend a little more steeply, on clear days there are views of the mountain (Ruapehu) from the ridge (04^{1159masl}) about 10 minutes after the hut clearing.

Ten minutes further on the trail transfers to the other (east) side of the ridge and at this point the ridge is rather narrow – again on good, clear days views are offered from around here (05^{1116masl}) and Poronui Station can be seen. There used to be wind-fall damaged sections around here and some care still has to be taken as there are drop offs associated landslips.

Te Iringa Hut clearing

From point 09 it is only 500metres on a bearing of 272degrees before arriving at the Tikitiki Stream (10^{755masl}) at a triple confluence but it is heavy going requiring almost 50 minutes, there is a hunters' clearing and campsite. From here, which is a good lunch spot, the real fun of the day starts following the stream to the SE. This is a major effort with too many stream crossings to count moving from left bank to right bank as terrain, river and vegetation dictate. The 2km to the SE to get to the end of the Te Iringa Track (13^{694masl}) at the Tikitiki Stream crossing takes two and a half hours. However it is an adventure for those that like bush bashing with the odd steep up-and-over round gorge areas on the streamline. One such was high above (11^{738masl}) the true left bank apparently overlooking where the waterfall was said to be, a glimpse of white water was visible! A family of Blue Duck was spotted (12^{744masl}) in the stream line. Finally a small confluence was arrived at and wading due N in the side stream reached the Tikitiki hunters' campsite.

This campsite is the turn-around point if the track was followed all the way and takes around three and half hours in and the same out again.

Stream crossing

On the return this crossing is a good marker as being about 20 mins from the car park

About 2hours just below the mapped top Te Iringa (1240m) the downhill starts (06^{1095masl}) but this is a long, relentless slope rather than anything to test the legs – or the lungs on the way back up. Attempts have been made in the past to try and locate the "Filthy Bivouac" which exists somewhere beyond the high point of the ridge but all efforts failed.

There are now many gentle sections of good track virtually on the contour (07^{1091masl}) so fast progress can normally be maintained up and downslope. Heading for the Tikitiki Waterfall necessitates leaving the track about 7km out (08^{995masl}) going right to the SW on a bearing of 221 degrees (magnetic 198degrees) on the gently sloping ridge – there is a vague track on the upper sections. This bearing has to be held for a bit over one kilometre and is slow going (38-40minutes). There is a break of slope – where the slope gets steeper - indicating the end of the ridge (09^{894masl}) with spurs going left and right, head to the right or due W. If heading to the end of the track instead stay on the marked track where the slopes start getting steeper on the descent.

Enjoy the break here as more hard work now commences with a very steep zig-zag for openers on the 300 metres of ascent ahead back up the Te Iringa track to pass the point (08 995masl) where the track was exited several hours previously. If doing this tramp always carry a torch and extra food as they could well be essential.
